ART

Art historian Katie Kresser, “One of the functions of art is to disrupt the calcification of faith.” I like this thought for a few reasons, but I especially like that she doesn’t say prevent the calcification of faith. Her verb choice—disrupt—assumes calcification is inevitable. What Kresser takes for granted is that we become numb to truth and beauty when it’s presented the same way again and again. One of art’s responsibilities is to make us vulnerable again, to subvert our callousness and make us porous enough to receive truth and beauty, the way poetry forces you to look at things from odd angles, to hear something familiar in a new cadence or imagine it sideways through metaphor. ...

In recent years, what's permeated my heart the most has not been my church's liturgy but poetry and visual art that touches the sacred, approaching faith in unfamiliar ways. Maybe it takes an artist's perspective to evoke mystery from what has grown familiar.
